“ I never knew Jean very well prior to the accident that sent her to Ruleme Center where she would live out the rest of her days. I still can't say I ever knew her well. She was a private person, sharp-witted, and well spoken. She once recited this poem- not in its entirety but enough that I was able to find it on the internet. She said her sister had read it to her at a young age and she had committed it to memory. So I brought a copy of the poem to her, and as I read it, she too read it out loud with me. I was amazed at how much she remembered. Sometimes I wonder why this poem spoke to her so. Unfortunately the space here is limited (I include the first stanza only) so I invite you to look it up and read it - "In School-Days" by John Greenleaf Whittier. Still sits the school-house by the road, A ragged beggar sleeping; Around it still the sumachs grow, And blackberry-vines are creeping.
